(TTh, 8:00- 9:50; LAB on Thursdays 10:00-11:50)

Calculus based honors physics, with laboratory. Topics include electricity, magnetism, optics. An advanced introduction to academic research and writing through intensive investigation of an issue or topic specified by the instructor. Students will be required to develop and organize a substantial research project related to the topic of the course and to demonstrate the information literacy skills required to find, evaluate, and make appropriate use of primary and secondary materials relevant to their project.

REL 235H: Origins of the Christian Religion (Arts and Humanities, WAC)

*(TTh, 10:00 - 11:15) Note: Paperwork submitted to classify as ALAAME

An examination of the emergence of Christianity in the ancient Mediterranean world as seen from the perspective of the comparative study of religion. Special attention will be given to the relationship between religion, ethnic identity, culture, and politics in the ancient world; the development of Christianity as a form of cultural identity distinct from Judaism; and the historical development of the beliefs, practices, and institutions that came to define it. Emphasis on close, critical analysis of primary texts.

HIS 220H: Debates in African American History (African American, SPAC)

(Tu/Th 12:30-1:45)

HIS 220H uses reacting to the past role-playing games to allow students to engage with ideas, arguments, and texts at pivotal moments of the past. Although specific topics and reacting games may vary, this course will focus on slavery, abolition, the African American struggle for equality in the antebellum period, and the meaning of citizenship, freedom, and democracy.

ENG 241H: Introduction to Fiction-Honors (US Social Diversity, WAC)

*(TTh, 2:00 - 3:15) Note: approval almost secured for this change

Focused on works that have received the Anisfield Wolf Book Prize, this course will teach students how to analyze, discuss, and write critically about fiction. This honors version of the course will also help students understand the histories and ideologies behind the types of analyses they are learning to perform on literature.
